THE ONE I'D SAY AT THE 19TH

Your prospecting problem is a filter, not a bigger list.

Johannes le Roux.

Swipe →

Qualifying in the meeting room.

It's the most expensive place it could possibly happen.

Score the company first. Then find the person inside it.

Sales Navigator finds decision makers fine. It doesn't tell you if the company is worth a meeting.

STEP ONE

Make the pitch state a number.

There's a minimum spend below which the deal can't work, whatever anyone wants. Until it's a rand figure, "big customer" is a feeling and every list is a guess.

STEP TWO

Find the one admin question that tells you the size.

People answer admin questions without feeling interrogated. Ask it before you book anything and most of the wasted meetings disappear.

STEP THREE

Stop spending the free report too early.

Gate it on the two answers, not on a meeting. Anyone who answers has qualified themselves.

Run it on three companies you already know.

One you'd love, one you'd pass on, one you're unsure about. If it ranks them the way you would, trust it on four hundred you've never heard of.

LAUNCH, LEARN, REPEAT

You know your market. The model doesn't.

Shout while you're in it, not after.